Landmark survey seeks women's views on reproductive health - Women across England are being encouraged to help shape future reproductive health policy by sharing their experiences of a range of issues, as the government launches a new landmark survey. Delivering on a key commitment in the Women's Health Strategy, the Women's Reproductive Health Survey will seek women's views across England on issues including periods, contraception, fertility, pregnancy and the menopause. Findings from the survey will then be used to better understand women's reproductive health experiences over time. The vital information gathered about the lives and experiences of women will inform current and future government decision-making and health policy. There are currently disparities in women's health across the country, and far too many cases where women's voices are not being heard. Along with the strategy, the new survey will play a key part in changing this..
